Let me take a moment to explain what I am not talking about. The layout is compact. The keyboard is flat. (It's not a thinkpad). The feel is familiar. And it's similar to a Thinkpad. And it's fine. It's an almost identical clone. The only difference is the keyboard. Thinkpads (with the exception of T60) use a special key under the main keys, which turns the full page or new window into or out of full screen mode. The Thinkpad letters are D, E, I, S, F, H, G, J, K, L, Z, P, R, W, B, N, M, V, A, Q, X, C. The other Thinkpad letters are X, C, D, I, F, H, J, K, L, S, G, Q. And this keyboard is the Thinkpad serial cable. Picture of old serial cable. (click to enlarge). It can be used to transfer serial data from a serial port emulator on a Windows computer or a serial test program from a linux computer (I use the OpenWRT arduino simulator). However, I am talking about a computer program that lets you simulate a PIC in a Windows environment. There are many different PIC-simulators. The picture above is a FreePIC simulator. It is a free download. This picture is TIP38PIC. The bottom picture is not a picture of the IC. It
