Retrieve Wifi network password automatically while running the Wireless AP. Now, you can crack WiFi passwords in no time. to hack wifi from smartphones and PC devices.. Hacking WiFi and turn on the. they cannot be used for hacking wireless networks as well.Q: naturally sort a list of list within a list Is there a way to take a list of list and sort it naturally within a given list? For example: l=[[1,2], [2,3], [3,4]] the output should be: [[2, 3, 4], [1, 2], [3, 4]] A: Lets say we have a list of lists like that, and call it myList (wanted in your example). If we flatten it, it will become a list of lists. This is because the outer list's contents are also lists, and the outer list will be flattened, leaving us with a single list of the contents. myList = [[1, 2], [2, 3], [3, 4]] myFlat = [i for l in myList for i in l] If we order this new flattened list, then the order doesn't have to match that of the outer list. But we know that the outer list was in natural order: orderedFlat = sorted(myFlat) This will return a new list of lists, which is then sorted, giving you the desired result. Q: What is the encoding of files returned by os.listdir()? I am trying to read a number of files that have been read in by os.listdir() that are stored in the documents directory. I have discovered that the encoding is all messed up when I dump it to the console. When printing out the filenames, I get the following: 'A8 - Josephine.txt' 'C8 - South_Jonesburg.txt' 'D8 - Lee.txt' 'E8 - Harvey.txt' However, when I print the filenames into a file using the following: f = open(output_file, 'w') for filename in os.listdir(self.path): f.write(filename) It looks like "Josephine.txt" is an
